THE WHISPERING GALLERY.

I was one of the privileged few who saw and heard Clara Morris as Meccy Merrick, in "The New Magdalen," at the Opera House, the other night. Exceptionally good as the setting was, the story of the play had for me a greater interest. The author's motive is to show vice in its own form; to hold the mirror up to society, that it may see itself reflected there. Mercy Merrick, the progeny of sin, was fallen almost from the cradle. Father-less from her birth, motherless at child-hood's tender time; homeless, friendiess, penniless, with no knowledge of the world, its quicksands, its shoals, its rugged rocks—an outcast in the great and bad city of London. Poor soul, she might have strayed into the peaceful life of an honest home. It might have happened to her as in the story books, that some rich and tilded addy, herselfchildees, struck by the marved lons beauty of the little match girl, took her to her own aumptonus home and made a fine lady of her. It did happen that also was sent to the workhouso as a begar—the first house scenely had taken of her existence; it did happen hat a man appeared on the scene, and, with the aid of a narcotic draught, put upon the child the stain of his own sin. After this all ismisery, wretchelenes, for Mercy Merrick—fritites cultors to "get back" to an hone at and reputable iffer—the who had only her poverly and her honor when she led—not wen she was rudely hurled into vice!

Well, what is the use of weaving this into a story and putting it on the stage?

I suppose Mr. Wikkie Collins desired to leach the public conscience in the hobe of arousing it from its torpor—to show so some his gard to be proved and according the proventing it from its torpor—to show so some his gard.

Permineration of the provent has mother's residence of the see.

I suppose Mr. Wilkie Collins desired to lash the public conscience in the hope of arousing it from its torpor-to show society how it connives at vice, how it enciety how it connives at vice, how it encourages men to make the downward way easy—oh, so easy for the other sex—and the regaining of the heights so hard,—to show that the Mrcy Mericks may be never so honest and earnest, society hounds them at every turn, refuses to allow them to reinstate themselves. For the sin of suffering a great wrong there is no explation—there are no waters to wash out the Scarlet Latter. Ah! the Hester Prymas! how they are tried in the fire! Merciful Father of the fatherless and the friendless! Will the world forever treat its hapless women with injustice and hyperity! damn them for being bad and give in the fire heights and the fire heights women with injustice and hyperity! damn them for heing bad and give Merciful Father of the fatheriess and the friendless! Will the world forever treat its hapless women with injustice and hypecrisy! damn them for being bad and give them no chance to be good! Refuges there are, yes; but they comot all remain in refuges forever. Work—that is the first thing; shelter under a reputable roof; the world's free pardon upon the sole condition of good behavior—a parole, if you please. "Do you want such a woman as compaction for your young daughter?" I did not set my heart upon my daughter marrying a negro, but I did regard slavery as a crime against thumenity. For raising his voice against the vicious pastimes of a priveleged class, an English editor is now in jail, his hair cropped close, the showy prison garb upon him. The protected roues wearstar and garters and powdered wigs, and hug the law's comforting assurance that it will have no disgusting disclosures made against the Queen's annointed. England has been a pioneer against the slave trade, and her guns have carried into China the priceless boon of the cpium traffic. oon of the cpium traffic.

I heard a lady speaking of Miss Morris's performance, find fault with the audience because of its coldness. I think she wronged the people who were present. Mary Anderson once gave an unusually fine rendition at the Opera House here of the role of Evadne. There was scarcely of the role of Evadne. There was scarcely a ripple of applause during the evening. Miss Anderson complained of this to her step-father, Mr. Griffin, who very sensibly told her that she never played to a more appreciative audence. I heard him repeat the conversation, and he took the same view as did Miss Anna Dickinson, who spoke of her shamefully small audience here when she read her tragedy, "Aurelian," as the most delightful gathering she ever attempted to entertain. Said she: "During the entire time I was on the stage the audience was as sight as if the house had been empty. Now, I consider applause vulger in comparison to such a testimonial as that."

This remark applies with equal force to

This remark applies with equal force to This remark applies with equal force to Miss Morris's performance here. When an andience maintains breathless silence for a quarter of an hour, losing sight of all things but the performance on the stage, it is a mark of approbation beside which applause is weak and insincere. But I heard a gentleman pay Miss Morris a higher compliment, the highest I think, an actress ever received. He said that in one of the scenes in "The New Magdalen" he lost sight of his surroundings, and witnessing Mercy Merrick's shame in the recital of her story, he involuntarily turned sway as if he had no right to wit ness a scene intended only for the two whem the woman was addressing.
